In the face of such censorship, a poetic sensibility permeates the New Iranian Cinema just as it permeates Iranian history and culture. This mystical poetry makes its presence felt significantly in the work of Kiarostami alongside the new Iranian poetry of Farrokzad, Sepehri, and Shamloou. The poetic tradition articulates the geography of the world of ‘a priori archetypal Images’ which only an inner world grasps. ‘When the mystic contemplates this universe,’ writes Henri Corbin, ‘it is himself that he is contemplating’ (Spiritual Body and Celestial Earth, 1977, p. 82). As elliptical and disorienting as Kiarostami’s narratives and spatial geographies may be, as Saeed Vafa points out, it is true that when matter manifests on Kiarostami’s screen, an other worldly inner geography is reflected in the mirror of a this worldly sensory image. As reductions of an original image, objects and spaces on screen in fact point to the inner world of Kiarostami’s characters and thus attempt to engage an imagination beyond the reach of the viewer’s sensory organs. To this end, the interviews that close the book are critically instructive about Kiarostami’s own mystical and poetic consciousness.

NEGAR MOTTAHEDEH
Duke University
© 2009, Negar Mottahehdeh

The Irish in Us: Irishness, performativity, and popular culture
Diane Negra (ed.)
London and Durham, Duke University Press, 2006
392 pp., illus., $23.95 (paper), $84.95 (cloth)

If nothing else, when the world economy went into an abrupt economic tailspin midway through 2008, it created a new vantage point from which to understand events of the previous decade—and in few places has this sense of rupture been more profound than in Ireland. Whereas the single distinguishing feature of post-Famine Ireland had been a relentless endemic poverty, in the early 1990s Ireland’s place in the world was dramatically transformed as the Irish economy went into a phase of unprecedented growth. By the time the essays in The Irish in Us were being written in 2004 and 2005, Ireland had become a land of hyperbole: it was the most globalised society in the world (according to the journal Foreign Affairs); per capita, it had one of highest GDPs in the world, the fastest growth rate in Europe, and so on. Today, in the weightless freefall that is Ireland after the collapse of the Celtic Tiger economy, there is the dizzying awareness of having experienced two moments of epochal change in less than 20 years.

It is a testimony to the coherence and insight of the essays in The Irish in Us that so many of them stand up so well in the new, uncertain dispensation. In part, this is due to the careful editorship of Diane Negra, both in her introduction, and in her own contribution, ‘Irishness, Innocence, and American Identity Politics Before and After September 11.’ Negra maps out the collection’s territory in theories of performativity, whose roots are in Judith Butler’s work on gender from the early 1990s, but which also draws heavily on more specifically Irish work, particularly Colin Graham’s Deconstructing Ireland (2001), which argued that ‘the idea of “Ireland” is produced more often as a citation than an actuality.’ Building on these ideas, Negra moves beyond essentialist understandings of Irish identity, towards what she refers to as the ‘everything and nothing’ status of Irishness (p. 1). Irishness, she argues, has been coded in so many ways—from deterministic racialism to lifestyle choice—that it has become almost infinitely malleable: ‘everything and nothing.’

To a greater or lesser extent, the other contributors to The Irish In Us use the space opened up by this position to explore the contradictory complexity of Irishness. Moreover, they do so across an impressive range of cultural practices, ranging from Natasha Casey’s fascinating analysis of the differing markets for Irish themed products in the US retail sector (from middle America to white supremacists), to Mary McGlynn’s reading of the popularity of Garth Brooks in Ireland, to Amanda Third’s speculations on the significance of red hair. Without exception, the contributors work closely to the brief of exploring aspects of performativity, although seldom to such unexpected effect as in Stephanie Rains’ highly original analysis of the business of genealogical research. Genealogy, Rains argues, can provide us with a way of ‘rethinking identity as neither fixed nor essential, nor endlessly fluid and freely self fashioned, and an always incomplete inventory of the self’ (pp. 156–157).

It is indicative of the velocities of change in recent Irish culture that the least satisfying essays here focus on films from the early 1990s, which in turn were grappling with an Ireland of the 1980s that now seems remote from contemporary concerns; Maria Pramaggiore’s essay on ‘Pregnancy and Performance in Contemporary Irish Cinema,’ which takes The Snapper (1993) as its frame of reference, and Maeve Connolly’s piece on Traveller identities. In the current cultural climate, there is a sense that both of these essays have been overtaken by events. On the other hand, the most solidly historical contribution here opens up genuinely new territory. Sean Griffin goes back to the so-called ‘Good Neighbour’ films of the 1940s, the Fox musicals that were intended to consolidate fellow feeling with American allies during World War II, and finds a group of Irish films, including Coney Island, Sweet Rosie O’Grady and Irish Eyes are Smiling (all 1943). Griffin’s reading of Irish Eyes are Smiling, in particular, suggests that there is much more to be done on Irish American cinema of this period, as he discovers musical numbers that employ cross dressing and blackface to create characters who swap ‘ethnic and racial masks,’ and who ‘wear their gender like a costume’ (p. 78), in ways that are deeply unsettling to fixed concepts of identity.

Griffin’s interest in the mutability and exchanges between Irish and African American identities picks up one of the most important thematic concerns running through The Irish in Us. This thread begins with Catherine Egan’s survey of what she calls ‘the racial politics of Hibernophobia,’ gains substance in Lauren Oakey’s detailed reading of Van Morrison’s absorption of black music, and takes an unexpected turn in Gerardine Meaney’s deployment of Richard Dyer’s theorisation of ‘the invisibility of whiteness’ (p. 255), in relation the character of Angel in Buffy the Vampire Slayer and Angel. However, the key essay to address the racial positioning of Irishness is Michael Malouf’s reading of the mixing of Irish and Caribbean cultures in Neil Jordan’s The Crying Game and in the music of Sinead O’Connor. ‘Rather than trying to explain away these instances of cross-cultural expressions as aberrations from the cultural norm,' suggests Malouf, we should use them to rethink ‘the role of transnational imagining in our conceptions of nationalism’ (p. 347).

Collectively, the essays in The Irish In Us are part of an important shift in Irish cultural studies. If anything has become evident as the Irish economy has imploded, it is that the wealth and economic growth of the Celtic Tiger period had obscured a much more profound change in Irish culture: Irish culture is now inextricably—for better or for worse—embedded in global networks of information and mass media, images and sounds. As such, it will not revert back to the more insular culture of earlier decades, which made it possible to sustain an essentialist understanding of identity. What lies ahead, The Irish In Us suggests, will be something more multi-faceted, more fluid, more complex—and probably more interesting.

Chris Morash
National University of Ireland, Maynooth
© 2009, Chris Morash

Sexy Thrills: undressing the erotic thriller
Nina K. Martin
Urbana and Chicago, IL, University of Illinois Press, 2007
vii+206 pp., $65.00 (cloth)

Nina K. Martin’s analysis of the direct-to-video (DTV) erotic thriller is a valuable addition to a body of work on film genres that have been under examined and often, critically derided. Martin cites Linda Williams’ work on gender and pornography (Hard Core: power, pleasure, and the “frenzy of the visible,” 1989) as an influence; her study also intersects with the project of Peter Lehman’s recent edited collection, Pornography, film and culture (2006), to which she contributed a chapter. Two other recent works, Linda Williams’ The Erotic Thriller in Contemporary Cinema (2003) and David Andrews’ Soft in the Middle: the contemporary softcore feature in its contexts (2006), have explored similar territory. Martin’s book is particularly focused on genre and spectatorship, and her claim is that the DTV erotic thriller merits critical attention because the genre addresses female viewers with representations of feminine independence and sexual agency. She argues that erotic thrillers participate in the cultural construction of femininity in ways that are rooted in long established, familiar genres, but also influenced by contemporary pop feminism.

Martin focuses most substantively on the generic parameters of the erotic thriller in chapters one and three. Her methodology combines an analysis of how the genre addresses women as spectators and serves the interests and profit motivation of the film industry as a whole. Films within the genre typically feature female protagonists who have difficulty balancing their professional and personal lives. The genre privileges a feminine subjectivity, hybridizes aspects of genres associated with femininity (such as melodrama and romance), and presents the male body as an erotic spectacle. DTV erotic thrillers have developed in the relatively recent past, within the